Fourteen years have passed since we started this blog (or maybe just three; I wasn't sure if I could post the whole thing). Since then, we've been to many different places — many if you include the 5+ states we have lived in in the past 11 years. But to celebrate our one-year anniversary, we've decided to reflect on all those trips, both good and bad, all the places we've been and all the ways we've grown as a family. Enjoy! A few weeks before our first family vacation, I decided to plan a memory-making trip. After chatting with some friends, I decided to visit the Blue Mountains in New South Wales. My friend from high school lives there, my husband's family lived there once, and our high school sweetheart went there when she visited her folks during a semester abroad. I figured we could make our own memories there. While we both agreed the trip would be fun, neither of us knew what to expect. We decided to let fate decide where we went. I loved the idea of it all. The possibilities of what would happen that weekend were endless. Would we run into anyone from our past? Would we visit the same place as our high school sweetheart? Would we run into some of our old friends who might stop us to say "How are you? It's been a while"? Would our kids spend the whole weekend running around screaming from thrill to thrill, only to come home and realize they weren't even bored one minute? Unfortunately, fate played right into my hands. Since my high school friends' house was a 10-minute drive away, it was literally a few minutes from the entrance to the Blue Mountains. I had planned a map that would help us identify our first stop, but it didn't quite fit all of our needs. So when we arrived in Dubbo, we chose to go for it, and found ourselves in the middle of nowhere, parked right in front of the Blue Mountains. I'll never forget
