

As the world's largest surveillance state, China has been accused of compiling surprisingly comprehensive video surveillance of its citizens, who are watched and recorded by security cameras located within every building. This is bad news for privacy-conscious Chinese netizens. Chinese journalists and activists have found a workaround to this issue: using an iPhone's selfie camera to film the girl from Beijing without using any sensor equipment. This can be achieved by making sure that your phone is placed on a surface with an uneven height to create an angel shot up her skirt before you take the picture ... in full view of security cameras in a public area in Beijing. This "perfect selfie," as the Chinese press called it, was filmed in a public area in Beijing, which has been captured by hundreds of CCTV cameras. BeritaBola

In the following video, the girl from Beijing [a CCTV camera] is filmed by a man holding his iPhone behind her. The video starts when he takes a selfie with his iPhone's front camera and ends when he does another one with its rear camera. The second shot is taken right after she was recorded on CCTV cameras of several buildings (around 2 minutes). Two versions are available of this video. To see the second version, please click here.
